

Complementarity

Following on from Bohr's concept which he applies not only to the physical situation of two contradictory positions of the electron at the same time but philosophically. Love and justice are two aspiring heights of human value but in certain circumstances could be in opposition. This we can see. Values too can be contradictory. Electrons are universal. The only way these values could be is with the existence of God. Otherwise they exist as a means to a more ordered and harmonious society for their justification. Does this potential opposition show us that not only the physical world is contradictory but also our values and that this understanding helps to open up the contradictory nature of God as part of the necessity of the universe. Thus values gain their contradictory truth through his existence and are underpinned by him. Just as are electrons.

If I have not made myself clear it is because the physical universe has still to be revealed and will give us the metaphor to call by another name the values we assert. Or to put it in the poet's words (always the most clear) he already exists in you "as your poetic friend, who is devoted and everlasting" -Ahmatova.